BEFORE THE FEED. BEFORE THE SCROLL. BEFORE THE METRICS
— THERE IS ATTENTION.

For No Algorithm, five artists were selected whose work approaches the theme from different perspectives. Tommi Viitala (p4) reflects on the velocity of algorithm-driven image consumption through motion and temporal distortion. Silke Seybold (p12) explores duration and physical space through slow, analog practices that resist the demand for constant visibility. Dina Belenko (p20) responds with a tactile, handcrafted process that restores material presence to the image. Anna Lena Raab (p28) observes everyday encounters with an intuitive analog approach that embraces imperfection and chance. Jordi Piris (p36) concludes with a contemplative exploration of light, geometry, and reduction, creating images that slow perception and move away from the logic of visual overproduction. Together, their works offer different forms of resistance to the systems that increasingly shape how images are made and seen.

TOMMI VIITALA

Algorithms are designed to maximize viewing time. They recognize what triggers a reaction and offer more of the same and the feed flows endlessly, with each swipe promising a new reward. Time condenses and disappears without notice; scrolling becomes a rhythm we no longer recognize. I wanted to bend that time. In my images, movement stretches and blurs like the fleeting images in the feed, but without the rewarding sharpness. Trains and people merge into horizontal flows – like a feed that is scrolled too quickly. Instead of stopping the image, it delays it. It forces you to slow down, to be present for a moment in the middle of the flow.

SILKE SEYBOLD

Silent Places emerged from years of returning to abandoned interiors, working slowly with analog film and lith printing. Through self-portraiture, I place my body into these quiet environments, not as performance but as a way of sensing and inhabiting them. The lith process introduces chance, fragility, and material presence. These images were not made for visibility, but from a need to remain with spaces and emotions that resist speed and resolution. My work is rooted in silence, duration, and the search for a visual language shaped outside expectations of attention and performance.

DINA BELENKO

Shining Creatures is my response to the relentless digitalization that flattens material experience into collections of pixels optimized for circulation. We are physical beings though. Our cognition is embodied. We need touch to think and feel. In this series, I construct transparent silhouettes by hand, creating objects that interact directly with light. They cast caustic shadows and fluid reflections, like sunlight refracted at the bottom of a pool. The images appear ephemeral, almost ghostly. But the process is physically involved and tactile. Their fragility on screen conceals the density of manual work behind them.

ANNA LENA RAAB

I work with analog cameras, allowing uncertainty and time to shape the image before it reveals itself in development. I keep filmic imperfections and mechanical traces, the somatic pulse of matter at work. I photograph places and people passing through my everyday life. Fleeting encounters, found moments. Drawn by instinct rather than intention, I follow what lingers in my vision. The series consists of black-and-white photographs in which figures appear alone or together, in motion or stillness. Perspectives shift high or low, reflected or direct. Within these frames, time seems to slow, holding brief, quiet intersections of space and presence.

JORDI PIRIS

BTTB (BACK TO THE BASICS) Is the title of a photographic serie that seeks a reencounter with my 80s photography which I gave priority to the concept, to the visualization, to the search of forms, textures, geometries and volumes in the environment. A photography influenced by the image-movement of photographers like Ersnt Haas, the geometric vision of Pete Turner or, others closer to me during 80s decade, such as Manel Esclusa. A series that tries to see the scenarios, objects and light that give them form from an analogical point of view, with little manipulation like the analogical multiple exposure processes of those days.
